Golf balls have conventionally been produced by molding a rubber composition with a highly mechanized molding method employing, as a raw material, a polymer composition containing copolymerized products of at least two monomers. Since the mechanical properties of the copolymerized product are considerably dependent on the type and proportion of the copolymerized products used, the physical properties of the rubber composition have been controlled by the selection of the copolymerized product. For instance, a multi-piece ball comprising a solid core and a cover has been formed by injecting a rubber composition that contains ethylene/methacrylic acid copolymer using a front injection molding. Ethylene/methacrylic acid copolymer is a polar polymer whose glass transition temperature is remarkably high and contains a carboxylic group, so that it is poor in processability by injection molding. In order to improve the processability by injection molding, ethylene/methacrylic acid copolymer must be blended with a large quantity of a nonpolar polymer having poor processability such as polyisobutylene or polystyrene in the form of a solution in a solvent. However, since the physical properties of the ethylene/methacrylic acid copolymer deteriorate due to the blending, attempts to achieve a balance between processability and physical properties have not been successful. When an ethylene/methacrylic acid copolymer is used in a
